It is most famously found in the Dead Sea Scrolls, discovered in the mid-20th century near the Dead Sea, which date back to the Second Temple period (circa 2nd century BCE to 1st century CE). These texts reveal a dualistic worldview where humanity is divided into two distinct groups: the sons of light, who embody righteousness and divine allegiance, and the sons of darkness, representing evil and opposition to God's will.

Origins in Jewish Apocalyptic Thought

Jewish apocalyptic thought during the Second Temple period emphasized the cosmic struggle between good and evil forces. The sons of light sons of darkness dichotomy reflected this worldview, portraying an ongoing battle leading to an ultimate divine judgment. This dualism is characteristic of sectarian groups such as the Essenes, who likely authored or preserved the Dead Sea Scrolls. The division between light and darkness symbolizes moral and spiritual purity versus corruption and sin.

For instance, the Old Testament makes frequent references to light and darkness as metaphors for righteousness and wickedness.
