

tax sale overage business

Tax sale overage business has emerged as a unique and potentially lucrative niche within the real estate investment industry. It involves the recovery of excess funds generated from the sale of properties at tax lien or tax deed sales. When properties are sold for unpaid taxes, the amount that exceeds the tax debt often becomes available as overage. This article delves into the intricacies of the tax sale overage business, how it operates, key strategies for success, and the potential risks involved.

Understanding Tax Sale Overages

Tax sales occur when property owners fail to pay their property taxes. Local governments auction off these properties to recover the owed taxes. In many cases, the sale price surpasses the amount owed, resulting in an excess, often referred to as "overage." This overage is typically held by the local government or taxing authority until claimed by the former property owner.

How Tax Sale Overage Works

1. Tax Delinquency: A property owner fails to pay their taxes for a specified period.
2. Tax Sale: The local government auctions the property to the highest bidder to recover the unpaid taxes.
3. Sale Price: The property is sold for an amount greater than the owed taxes, creating an overage.
4. Claim Process: The former property owner is entitled to claim this overage, but many are unaware of their rights or the process involved.

The overage amount can be substantial, often ranging from a few hundred to several thousand dollars, depending on the property value and the local market dynamics.

Why the Tax Sale Overage Business is Attractive

The tax sale overage business appeals to many entrepreneurs for several reasons:

- Low Startup Costs: Unlike traditional real estate investing, where significant capital is often required, entering the tax sale overage business typically requires minimal financial investment.
- High Returns: With careful research and strategy, the returns from claiming overages can be significant, often yielding several times the initial investment in terms of time and effort.
- Social Impact: Helping former property owners reclaim lost funds can foster goodwill and create positive community relations.
