Origins and Early Visual Depictions of the Slave Trade

The origins of the slave trade date back to ancient civilizations, where enslaving conquered peoples was a common practice. Early visual representations of slavery can be found in ancient Egyptian, Greek, and Roman artwork, showing captives and servants in various forms. However, the pictorial history of the slave trade gains particular emphasis with the rise of European exploration and colonization in the 15th century. Early maps and woodcuts began to depict the African continent and the emerging trade routes used by European powers. These images often portrayed Africans through a Eurocentric lens, reflecting the prejudices and economic motivations that fueled the trade.

Ancient and Medieval Imagery

Illustrations from ancient manuscripts and artifacts provide a glimpse into the early conceptions of slavery. These pieces often show enslaved individuals in submissive roles, sometimes as prisoners of war or laborers. The artistic style varies greatly but consistently emphasizes the power imbalance between enslavers and the enslaved.

Early European Exploration and Cartography

Maps from the 15th and 16th centuries began to include detailed coastal outlines of Africa, marking trading posts and routes where slaves were captured and sold. These images were instrumental in promoting maritime expeditions and spreading knowledge about the slave trade's geography.

The Transatlantic Slave Trade and Illustrated Records
