Line-by-Line Analysis

Stanza 1

Lines 1-2:

"Sundays too my father got up early"

"and put his clothes on in the blue black cold"

The poem opens with a stark portrayal of the father's dedication. The use of "Sundays too" suggests that this routine is not limited to weekdays, emphasizing the father's unwavering commitment. The phrase "blue black cold" establishes a vivid image of the harsh winter mornings, evoking a sense of discomfort. This juxtaposition of the father's actions against the cold environment highlights his resilience and the sacrifices made for the family.

Line 3:

"Then with cracked hands that ached"

The imagery of "cracked hands" introduces a physical element of the father's labor, suggesting a life of hard work that has taken a toll on his body. The use of "ached" not only denotes physical pain but also evokes emotional suffering, hinting at the sacrifices made out of love.

Lines 4-5:

"from labor in the weekday weather made banked fires blaze."

Here, the father's efforts to "bank fires" signal his desire to provide warmth and comfort for the family. The mention of "weekday weather" contrasts with the Sunday routine, indicating that the father's labor extends beyond just physical work; it encapsulates emotional and familial responsibilities as well.

Line 6:

"I'd wake and hear the cold splintering, breaking"

This line introduces the speaker's perspective. The sound of "cold splintering" creates an auditory image, adding to the sensory experience. It implies a moment of awakening, both literally and metaphorically, as the speaker reflects on the harshness of winter and the father's quiet efforts.

Stanza 2

Lines 7-8:

"When the rooms were warm, he'd call"

“and I’d hear him, call out.”

In these lines, we see a shift to the warmth created by the father's labor. The father's voice calling out emphasizes his role as a provider and nurturer. However, the repetition of "call" suggests a longing for recognition and connection, hinting at the speaker's ambivalence toward the father's authority and presence.

Lines 9-10:

“What did I know, what did I know
of love’s austere and lonely offices?”

The speaker's repeated questioning reflects a sense of regret and introspection. The phrase “love’s austere and lonely offices” encapsulates the idea that love is often expressed through difficult sacrifices and unacknowledged labor. This line suggests that the speaker failed to recognize the father's deep love and commitment, which were often masked by his stern demeanor.

Stanza 3

Lines 11-12:

“Days when I’d wake and hear the cold splintering, breaking and finding the blue black cold.”

This repetition of the imagery from the first stanza reinforces the cyclical nature of the father's sacrifices. It indicates that the speaker's realizations come after many similar experiences, highlighting the theme of gradual understanding. The phrase “finding the blue black cold” suggests a recognition of the environment's harshness, paralleling the emotional coldness that can exist in familial relationships.

Lines 13-14:

“Like a pair of cracked hands that ached

and made for us.”

In this closing line, Hayden brings the poem full circle. The “pair of cracked hands” reiterates the father’s physical toll but also symbolizes the love and care he provided for the family. The phrase “made for us” suggests a profound acknowledgment of the father’s sacrifices, positioning them as acts of love that contributed to the family's well-being.
