Frequently Asked Questions

What is the N400 component in vocabulary studies?

The N400 is an event-related potential (ERP) component observed in EEG studies, typically associated with the brain's response to semantic incongruities or unexpected words during language processing.

How are N400 questions used in vocabulary research?

N400 questions often involve presenting words or sentences that create semantic expectancy or incongruity, allowing researchers to measure the N400 amplitude as an indicator of lexical-semantic processing.

What does a larger N400 amplitude indicate in vocabulary experiments?

A larger N400 amplitude generally indicates greater difficulty in semantic processing, such as when a word is unexpected or does not fit the context.

Can N400 responses be used to assess vocabulary knowledge?

Yes, N400 responses can reflect an individual's semantic processing abilities and vocabulary knowledge by showing how well they integrate word meanings in context.

What types of vocabulary tasks elicit N400 responses?

Tasks like semantic priming, word pair comparison, sentence completion, and anomaly detection are commonly used to elicit N400 responses.

Are N400 questions and answers useful in language learning?

They can be useful for understanding how learners process vocabulary and for developing methods to improve semantic integration and word comprehension.

How quickly does the N400 response occur after a vocabulary stimulus?

The N400 typically peaks around 400 milliseconds after the presentation of a semantically relevant stimulus.

Is the N400 response language-specific or universal?

The N400 is considered a universal neural marker for semantic processing across different languages, though its characteristics can vary depending on linguistic context.

What are common challenges in interpreting N400 vocabulary data?

Challenges include differentiating N400 effects from other ERP components, individual variability in brain responses, and controlling for factors such as word frequency and context complexity.
